My Story So Far

This week has been moderately tough so I would rate the difficulty of pulling this project off a 10. I am in the department of forgery so my job was (with Sarina) to make articles explaining the three high schoolers that got caught making and selling bananadine. I felt like I was working almost two jobs because I would make up the story as I went and people actually liked the way it was worded. So in reality, I was in the department of storytelling and forgery. It was kind of annoying because the department of forgery would give us limited information and we would have to make up the rest of the story by ourselves. We would do this because they would just do one thing and do nothing else afterwards putting us behind. I slowly realized that they were doing this because they didn't have faith in this project and that they thought it wasn't going to be pulled off. Something else I've learned this week is that the project was somewhat boring because I felt that I was not learning much. I know that this project has to do with communication and all but I can just go on social media and do the same thing. Some things I have learned if we were to do this project is to not do too many things at once or else someone else will decipher it like nothing. Our Instagram account got banned for some time and on wikipedia, it tells you when it was last edited so it would be fishy. Aside from that, I haven't really learned much from this project except how much everyone hates it.
